

HONORS PROGRAM AT FCLC

The honors program at Fordham College at Lincoln Center is an opportunity for talented and motivated students to explore many areas of learning in a small intellectual community of student scholars and faculty. The program is limited to approximately 18 students in each year and is directed by a faculty member, as well as a faculty adviser who stays with each class through their four years. The honors program gives students a solid grounding in the major academic disciplines, and then prepares the students for independent learning and research, culminating in a senior thesis or project.

Students are selected for invitations to the honors program in the spring before their first year. On rare occasions students are admitted to the program in the middle of their first year or at the beginning of their sophomore year. The honors curriculum replaces the regular Core Curriculum of the college with a series of intensive seminars. A dedicated honors seminar room on the ninth floor of the Lowenstein Center is available for honors classes and other activities. Students enrolled in the honors program gather outside of class for occasional dinners, visits to museums and libraries, and cultural events.

For more information

Visit the Lincoln Center Honors Program web page.