Who speaks for peace, justice and diversity in our contemporary world of national, cultural, religious, racial and gender differences and conflict?

With a minor degree in peace and justice studies at Fordham, you can, addressing the most central issues of our day.

Interdisciplinary Courses
Courses in the humanities and the social sciences provide you with a broad knowledge of social justice issues covering topics of war, terrorism, colonialism, poverty, religious conflict, human rights, multiculturalism, humanitarianism, economic and environmental justice, race and gender equality, and conflict prevention and peacemaking.

Experiential Learning
You will pursue experiential service learning through volunteer work, internships, and co-curricular projects in Fordham programs such as the Dorothy Day Center for Service and Justice, Multicultural Affairs, Global Outreach, United Nations Academic Impact, Study Abroad, and the Social Innovation Collaboratory.

Fordham Mission and Tradition
You will join a program which has served Fordham’s Jesuit mission of peace, justice and diversity for four decades. The program was first inspired by liberation theology, the civil rights movement of the 1950s and 1960s, and philosophies of nonviolence and citizen activism. Today the program also encompasses global justice issues inspired by the international human rights movement and shaped by the UN’s Sustainable Development Goals.

A Distinctive Professional Profile
The peace and justice minor makes your professional profile distinctive and set you apart, whether your career goals are in government, NGOs, law, business, education, health care, community development, or religious organizations.

Advising
John van Buren, Program Director
Collins Hall 111, evanburen@fordham.edu (davenport@fordham.edu)

For more information
Visit the Peace and Justice Studies program web page.

Programs
- Peace and Justice Studies Minor